The latest data from the Central Statistics Office showed that the apartment stock in Dublin has grown by 8,000 units over the past seven years and by 10,000 units in the past two. An estimated 1.4 million people in Dublin are currently living in private housing and the latest estimates suggest that the percentage of Dublin homes in private ownership has risen over the past decade. The Central Statistics Office data shows that the number of properties in the city not in the ownership of any individual has increased from 8,800 in 2010 to 9,625 last year. Speaking this afternoon, Minister for the Environment Alan Kelly said that there was a "massive gap" between the supply of and demand for housing in Dublin. He said that there had been a huge increase in population since 2010 but that the construction of new homes had "stagnated" despite the number of new apartments being constructed increasing last year and the year before. The increase in the number of vacant homes was leading to a sharp rise in the vacancy rate
