I found that you can run a View and then copy the.js and.aspx files to one directory and everything still works. Is it possible to return both.js and.cs files from ASP.NET MVC 3 controller action? A: Yes. You can use the File method to generate both or asp.net mvc will handle the.js files just fine. I would imagine there is a default web server on your machine that handles.js files. Q: How do I combine a node.js and express server? I am quite new to nodejs, and I have what I think to be a simple problem. I'm trying to set up a server so that I can send out simple http requests from the client. I've read up a bunch on express and I've added it to my project. When I get to the point where it begins to hit my server code, I get the following error. GET dfe /home/dave/workspace/rhi/rhi/node_modules/express/lib/router/index.js:273 throw new TypeError('options.route.property is not a function, got'+ ^ TypeError: options.route.property is not a function, got undefined My server.js file looks like this: app.get('/event/data', function (req, res) { var qs = require('querystring') console.log(req.params) var type = req.params.type console.log(type) //console.log(req.query.params) res.end(JSON.stringify(req.params, null, '+'))

But now a new study has found that varying the amount of clothing we wear can influence the temperature of our internal body systems. The body just doesn't like to make that transition over night. So the researchers found that clothing can keep a person a lot warmer than we'd normally think. But less clothing can get you hotter than you want. When we're hot and sweating we can wear less clothes, and the air temperature in the room doesn't matter as much. But then we just can't tell what the temperature is in our body and how we'll feel once we're fully dressed. So, the body can work well in a shirt and jeans even if the air is much hotter than that. The researchers say they could use this concept to design under garments. These can make a person feel a lot cooler. But right now, people still need to know exactly what the air temperature is where they are and try and match the clothing with that.Is there a difference in lymphocyte counts between lymph nodes from the tonsil and cervical lymph nodes, and is the latter a normal lymph node?
