Alterations in the expression of proteins specific for photoreceptor cells in the retina of the Japanese quail, Coturnix coturnix japonica. The expression of four photoreceptor-specific proteins, rhodopsin (R), arrestin (AR), transducin (T), and recoverin (RV), was studied in the retina of the Japanese quail (Coturnix coturnix japonica) using the avidin-biotin immunocytochemical method.

During maturation, the expression of R was found to be very specific for photoreceptor cells, and was first detected in the central retina in older chicks. At the early stages of retinal development, no expression of AR was detected in photoreceptor cells, but after the 3rd week of development, AR expression was detected in inner retina. Thereafter, in the older retinas, AR expression was restricted to the central and peripheral region. This result suggests that photoreceptor cells originate from the central region during the development of the retina and migrate to the peripheral region. In the embryonic retina, the expression of T was detected in the outer nuclear layer at the 15th day of incubation, and AR was detected in the outer and inner segment. At the later stages of development, the expression of T was detected in the outer nuclear layer and in all retinal layers, and the expression of AR was detected in the inner and outer segment at the 2nd week, and was restricted to the central retina at the 3rd week. Our results suggest that the expression of AR is relatively early, and that photoreceptor cells begin to differentiate before the expression of R and T. Furthermore, T was expressed in photoreceptor cells, suggesting that it plays an important role in photoreceptor cells during the differentiation of photoreceptor cells. Identification of conserved motifs in Hoxa-d homeobox genes from the oyster Crassostrea gigas. Genes of the Hox genes were identified in the oyster, Crassostrea gigas and e79caf774b
