Technical Field This invention relates to photolithography and in particular to the production of semiconductor devices in which the exact pattern of device components is reproduced with extreme precision. 2. Background Art Techniques for fabricating integrated circuits from a silicon wafer are well known in the art. In general, a single crystal silicon ingot is sliced into individual wafers which are then subjected to a sequence of processing operations to fabricate a number of integrated circuits on the wafer. Typically, the wafers are fabricated in a multi-chamber system in which the operations performed in each chamber are integrated in order to streamline the process. This allows the number of integrated circuits on a given wafer to increase. After the integrated circuits are fabricated on the wafer, the wafers are tested to determine which of the circuits on the wafer function properly. The tests are typically performed by testing the various circuit components formed on the individual integrated circuits. The defective circuits are subsequently removed from the wafer using a compound called photoresist. The photoresist can be sprayed onto the wafer, melted and then rolled into the circuit components, or it can be dropped on the wafer and hardened by exposure to a hardening light source. The photoresist at each component location protects the corresponding circuit component from the various processing operations to be applied to the wafer. After all the photoresist is applied, the wafers are subjected to a series of operations including etching, deposition, oxidation, and polishing which modify the physical surface or topology of the wafer. These operations are performed to produce an integrated circuit which functions properly and is capable of performing a desired function. The basic process described above is repeated a number of times to form a number of integrated circuits on a wafer. Each wafer is subjected to an extensive series of steps before it can be packaged and the resulting integrated circuits used to form the various product lines. The equipment which is used to perform this operation is generally termed a photolithography system. During the photolithography process, the wafers are placed on a silicon oil which is poured onto the top surface of the wafers. This allows the wafers to be easily positioned and transported between the various processing stations. The wafers are then positioned on a vacuum chuck and

The Pakistani prime minister has held talks with the Indian foreign secretary in Islamabad to discuss how to open a formal diplomatic process to resolve the region's most enduring conflict, following recent advances in recent weeks. Foreign Minister Shah Mehmood Qureshi met with India's S.M. Krishna on Tuesday to discuss bilateral issues and regional security issues that have raised the possibility of extending the 2015 draft peace agreement to include a dialogue on Kashmir. Pakistan's foreign ministry said the meeting between the foreign minister and the Indian foreign secretary concluded on Tuesday morning. The prime minister's spokesman said the meeting was "constructive" and "fruitful" and discussed the "process, modalities and environment for formal talks between the two countries". The spokesman said that the Pakistani foreign minister would continue to engage with his Indian counterpart in the coming weeks to build confidence between the two countries and implement the "diligent" agreement reached during a 2015 meeting between Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif and Prime Minister Modi.
