Sarcoidosis is a multisystem disorder in which the presence of noncaseating granulomas is critical to the diagnosis. The pathogenesis of sarcoidosis is not completely understood, and little is known about the role of alveolar macrophages in the development of sarcoidosis. Because alveolar macrophages participate in the clearance of pathogens, they may be affected by sarcoidosis, and the proteomes of these cells could be altered in patients with sarcoidosis. In the present study, we used an exploratory proteomic approach to characterize the proteins of alveolar macrophages from patients with sarcoidosis. We report a 1.2-fold increase in the relative abundance of cytoskeletal proteins in granulomatous tissue and of proteins involved in signal transduction in alveolar macrophages from sarcoid patients. Sarcoid alveolar macrophages also displayed an increase in the relative abundance of proteins of the phagocytic pathway. Overall, our studies suggest that sarcoid alveolar macrophages are activated and that they are the predominant cell type within granulomatous tissue in sarcoidosis.Development and validation of HPLC method with mass spectrometry detection for the determination of metformin in pure form and in drug products of the ezetimibe/metformin fixed-dose combination. To develop and validate an HPLC method with UV-Vis and mass spectrometry detection using DAD and Q-TOF-MS, respectively, for the determination of metformin as a key component in the impurity testing of ezetimibe/metformin HMG CoA reductase inhibitor fixed-dose combination (FDC) products.
