Pages Tuesday, January 9, 2015 Time for some Cross-blogging: Pro-Branching, Anti-Branching Yesterday, I spent some time on Twitter wondering about the prospects for the Modern Branching Process (MBP) and its various ramifications. My view is that it is largely a misguided project and it will only produce bad results. Among other things, I want to address the high up-front costs of "requirements". I'll also explain why I'm dubious of the value of the MBP, but to explain these two, you need to read this post from last year, which I'd like to share with you: The point of the MBP is to get people to think differently about their applications. This is why it's important to not just be against branching models, but rather, for an alternative. That alternative is to stay away from features altogether. I don't mean that you should never take advantage of a feature to speed up development. I mean that, in deciding which features to use, you shouldn't be looking for a way to automatically accelerate development. The MBP is a tool that allows you to decide when not to use features. What I say is true whether you are using a fork or a branch. Branching is just a way of sharing change between two applications. There isn
