The longtime WWE Hall of Famer and award-winning actor discusses his legacy in sports-entertainment and his passion for acting. Rowdy Roddy Piper emerged from a long road of injuries, alcohol, and drug abuse and made a name for himself in the squared circle. But as an actor, Roddy Piper is still as memorable as he was as a WWE Superstar. In a conversation with The Hollywood Reporter, Piper discusses the value of a storyteller and what it means to be a successful storyteller. He also talks about why the WWE Hall of Famer is very passionate about a character he played for years, even though it was not written with him in mind. Piper was not only successful in the ring, he was also very successful in the world of acting, amassing an impressive collection of film and television credits. The WWE Hall of Famer's other roles include playing the title role in "The Crow" and lending his voice to several characters in "Kevin Smith's Elm Street" and "Spawn." His biggest role, however, was probably "The One That Got Away," in which he played the last segment of the legendary WWE wrestler Harley Race. The WWE Hall of Famer also discussed the value of creating your own legacy and said that he would rather be remembered for the work he has done as an actor than as a WWE Hall of Famer. "I'd rather be remembered for the work I did as an actor," Piper said. "And as much as people like to think of the Superstars and the wrestlers as somewhat the God-like creatures, they're just people. They're hard working people. I look at wrestling as an odd field of work. If you're a farmer and you get into an argument, or you're a sports-entertainment professional and you get into an argument, there's a lot of things that go on, but that are hard. I don't think that a lot of people get to deal with that level of people on a day-to-day basis. I
